WLTX-TV and SCDA Plant Vegetables to Raise Food Awareness

If you're new to gardening, you can now see how it's done by watching updates of Gandy's Garden on WLTX-TV, Columbia's CBS affiliate.

Weatherman Jim Gandy saw a need to help people cope with rising food prices by teaching them how to garden. Naturally, the station executives sought out the help of the SC Department of Agriculture.

Weatherly Thomas, Executive Director of the SC Fruit, Vegetable and Specialty Crop Association, planned and built the garden for the news station.

"They wanted to go great guns right from the beginning, so I built eight raised beds for them, six 8x4's and two 4x4's. We planted a traditional Southern summer garden with tomatoes, okra, squash, zucchini, cucumbers, watermelon, sweet and hot peppers, green beans, eggplant, corn and herbs."

Gandy is new to gardening but is learning fast with Thomas' help. "He's excited to get his hands in the soil and see things grow. It's been a lot of fun working with him and other members of the station. They are doing a great job showcasing all the different aspects of growing your own fruits and vegetables, from irrigation and pest management to mulching and food safety," Thomas said.

The garden should have some crops ready by mid-July. Once produce starts coming in, WLTX plans to invite local chefs to do cooking demonstrations to highlight some go-to recipes for fresh fruits and vegetables.

WLTX plans to keep Gandy's Garden going well beyond just the summer months. "We've got a plan for succession plantings and season extension to keep the garden producing all year long, transitioning to fall and winter crops as the summer goes on," Thomas said. "That's the best part of all this, getting the opportunity to let folks see that growing their own is possible and it's something they can do year-round."

Attend AgAware Workshops

AgAware is sponsoring a series of workshops for young, beginning and minority farmers. The next session will be held July 19 in Orangeburg at Orangeburg-Calhoun Technical College.

Information will be presented about balance sheets, income, and what it takes to farm. Other segments will cover marketing, risk management and how to apply for financing. The marketing session will be conducted by Ansley Rast Turnblad of the SC Department of Agriculture (SCDA).

A similar workshop will be held on Aug. 2 at Clemson University. The marketing session will be led by Aaron Wood, SCDA Assistant Commissioner.

Both workshops will be from 9 a.m. until 4:30 p.m., with lunch provided. The sessions are free, but advance registration is requested, either online at www.agsouthfc.com or email owens@agsouthfc.com.

AgAware is the marketing component of AgSouth Farm Credit, whose mission is to educate and promote the next generation of young, beginning, small and minority farmers. They offer educational workshops, proactive community involvement, and projects to promote agriculture.

A Dirt Farm?

As I travel all over South Carolina, I'm always running across new and interesting ventures in agriculture. This one that I have to share with you comes from the Low Country.

Last month the SC Ag Council took a group of folks down to Johns Island to visit Dirt Works Incubator Farm. If you're not aware, the Ag Council, which is dedicated to the promotion of our state's agriculture, does a great job of educating its members. In addition to quarterly lunch meetings (with great food!), they also sponsor two exceptional tours which are open to the public. Membership is open to anyone who is interested in agriculture.

Regarding the visit to Dirt Works, you're probably wondering what an incubator farm is. Some folks asked if they were raising poultry, having "incubator" in their name. But what they are doing is educating new farmers.

This exciting program called "Growing New Farmers" is the first of its kind in the state. Historically, the next generation of farmers has been those who grew up on farms to become farmers themselves. But as many of those children left the farms for other careers, that left a gap in the knowledge pool. With farmers aging (the average age of a South Carolina farmer is 57), the old ways are in danger of becoming lost.

Growing New Farmers is a three-phase program that teaches people—men and women, young, middle-aged, and older—how to be successful farmers. When you think about it, they're cramming a lifetime of knowledge into just a few years.

One is the most important components is the 10-month apprenticeship that stresses classroom and field training. Located on the old Walnut Hill Plantation, the program allows each of the 20 or so apprentices to learn whether they have what it takes to become farmers. According to Nikki Seibert, the director of Sustainable Agriculture and our hostess for the day, the new small farmers are learning to grow their own crops.

When the SC Ag Council visited Dirt Works on Johns Island recently, they learned about sustainable agriculture from one of the apprenticeship graduates. John Warren, left, is the owner of Spade and Clover Gardens at Dirt Works Incubator Farm.

The new farmers learn how to prepare the ground, measure the rows, use mulch, set up drip irrigation, and plant their seed. Since Dirt Works uses organic practices, they learn about natural pest control and fertilizers. On the day we visited, several apprentices and incubator farmers—some of them not so young—were laboring on their plots, weeding, mulching, staking and getting ready to harvest some early produce.

The great thing about this program is that Dirt Works provides the land, tractor, infrastructure, supplies, and a start-up plan. The training doesn’t stop with growing the vegetables—or chickens, or dairy goats, or herbs, or whatever they have chosen—but also teaches the farmers how to market their products. They learn about post-harvest handling and transportation, as well as the financial aspects of agriculture.

Dirt Works has a modern packing shed with refrigerated units that can handle just about any type of produce. The new farmers also learn how to deal with customers. As Nikki pointed out to the class, no matter how proud they are of what they have grown, it’s what’s inside the sample box that sells.

At the end of three years, each graduate can receive advice through the Farm Land-Match program on either purchasing or leasing land of his own.

Growing New Farmers, now in its fourth year in South Carolina, has graduated 95 people. While they have applicants from all over the country, they want people who will stay in our state after they finish the program. We are very pleased that this program is available in our state. As it succeeds in producing new farmers, the future looks even brighter for sustainable agriculture.

They can choose what they want to plant, and each apprentice is paired with a mentor—an experienced, successful farmer—who gives them advice. During lunch we heard one of the apprentice farmers grumbling that his mentor “is always telling me I’m doing things wrong.” Might be a little frustrating to hear that, but the lessons are a whole lot less expensive this way.

After a successful apprenticeship, the budding farmer can apply to work on the incubator farm. Instead of a cubicle and a computer, each of the six Dirt Works farmers gets an acre and a half and a tractor, Nikki explained.
